

Dear Chairman Powell and Commissioners,
I am sure you are aware that the FCC used to have a policy called "The Fairness Doctrine" that was repealed in the 1980's.

As a citizen who wants to be informed about the political and electoral issues that affect my life, I am greatly disappointed by the lack of informative television programming and its substitution with opinionated spew that passes itself off as journalism.

Local public affairs programming is virtually non-existent--constituting less than one half of 1% of all local programming. More than half of news broadcasts prior to the 2002 elections did not include a single campaign story. Our democracy is at risk when many Americans don't know basic facts about the candidates or the issues, as was the case in the 2000 elections.

Since broadcasters have clearly failed in their obligation to serve the public interest, the FCC should define meaningful public interest requirements that include local civic and electoral affairs programming. At a minimum, broadcasters should air three hours per week of local civic and electoral affairs programming, with at least two hours devoted to substantive election coverage in the six weeks prior to Election Day.

If broadcasters fail to meet these minimal standards, I would ask that you consider requiring free air time to allow candidates to speak directly to citizens about issues that matter to us.

As the elections approach, a well-functioning democracy demands that citizens have access to a diversity of opinions and voices on the choices confronting us.

Sincerely,

Hugh Geenen
